The morning ferry crosses the estuary twice before the tide turns, carrying commuters, bicycles and crates of vegetables from the farms on the far shore. Nobody on board hurries; they read, drink tea from flasks and watch the herons stand in the shallows. When the ferry docks, a short queue forms along the jetty and the deckhand coils the rope with practised ease.

Cell placement probe follows.

Lanterns hang along the harbour wall and swing gently whenever the evening wind rises from the bay lighting the cobbles below. 	Orchard keepers gather windfall apples in wi  ets and sort bruised fruit from so re the cider press opens.
Beneath the viaduct a market sells cheese and rye loaves with pickled beetroot and knitted scarves to anyone passing by. 	Snow settles quietly on the signal box while the last freight train rumbles north with its brake lamps glowing amber and red.
Pupils in the village school learn to read weather from clouds and note each morning how high and how fast they travel. 	Seed catalogues arrive in January and the allotment holders circle their favourites long before the soil is ready to dig.
