The harbour wall keeps the swell away from the moored boats, and the old lamps along the quay come on one by one as the light fades behind the hills. A few walkers stop to read the notice boards, and a dog sleeps in the doorway of the chandler.

Careful typesetting never relies on luck: every paragraph is measured, every break is chosen, and the space around an illustration is set by rules that can be written down. A reader notices only when those rules are broken, and then the page feels wrong.

The harbour wall keeps the swell away from the moored boats, and the old lamps along the quay come on one by one as the light fades behind the hills. A few walkers stop to read the notice boards, and a dog sleeps in the doorway of the chandler.

