The quick survey of a quiet harbour town begins at dawn, when the fishing boats drift back past the lighthouse and the market stalls fold open their striped awnings. Gulls wheel over the quay while merchants argue cheerfully about the price of mackerel, and a baker carries warm loaves across the cobbles to the cafe on the corner. By noon the visitors arrive, and the narrow streets fill with the sound of voices, bicycle bells and distant music. Typesetting depends on small decisions repeated thousands of times: where a line ends, how much space follows a paragraph, and which words travel together across a page boundary. A faithful reproduction must make exactly the same decisions, because one different break early in a document moves every line that follows it onto a different page.
